

Legislative Column for the Week of May 14, 2018

Greetings,

Last week, the Missouri General Assembly gave final approval to the state's $28 billion operating budget for the next fiscal year. The proposal now heads to the governor's desk for his consideration.

Passing the budget is the only constitutionally-mandated responsibility of the state legislature. As such, state lawmakers treat it with the utmost importance. As a result of projected revenue increases, the latest budget provides more funding for elementary and secondary education than the previous year's budget, while managing to keep appropriations for colleges and universities level. As a state, we should be doing more to help every Missourian achieve a quality and affordable education, but this is a good start. Additionally, the budget provides modest pay raises to state employees. This is also important; without our dedicated civil servants, Missouri government couldn't function. We should reward our state employees, who are some of the lowest-paid in the nation, for all their hard work.

Altogether, I believe this year's budget process went rather smoothly. The ease with which both chambers agreed to a final proposal days in advance of our May 11 deadline is a testament to the camaraderie within, and between, our legislative bodies. We may not always agree on the issues, but when it comes to keeping the state afloat, lawmakers across the ideological spectrum are more than willing to come together for the good of Missouri.

Now that the budget is passed, the General Assembly will consider a few final legislative proposals before the 2018 legislative session ends on May 18. In September, the legislature will return to Jefferson City to discuss any bills vetoed by the governor over the summer. Then, in January, a new legislative session will begin — and the process will start all over again.

Below, you will find a chart tracking the progress of every bill I have sponsored during the 2018 legislative session. These proposals are important to Missourians of all backgrounds. I look forward to discussing each and every one of them before the Missouri Senate.
